We found the May 26th news release titled, “American Tungsten Ramps-up Exploration Operations; Initiates 35,000 ft Surface and Underground Drilling Program at Ima Mine” particularly noteworthy and here are 5 key data points from it:

- Big Exploration Ramp-Up – American Tungsten has shifted into a much larger exploration phase at the Ima Mine, launching a 35,000-foot drilling campaign across both underground and surface targets.
- Four Rigs Turning at Once – The Company now has four drill rigs active on site – two underground and two surface rigs – a major step-up in pace designed to generate a steady flow of results.
- Multiple Shots at Discovery Growth – This is not a single-target drill program. The campaign is testing vein extensions, strike continuity, deeper mineralization, and western targets, giving the Company several opportunities to expand the known tungsten system.
- Underground Expansion in Motion – American Tungsten is also driving a new D-level crosscut to open fresh underground drill stations, which should help it chase mineralization beyond the historic workings.
- Building Toward a U.S. Tungsten Restart – The expanded program supports the Company’s broader plan to move the past-producing Ima Mine toward renewed production, at a time when domestic tungsten supply is strategically important.
